BBW warns of scam targeting Netflix users

ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The Better Business Bureau is warning customers of phishing scams that are targeting Netflix users.

Users who are targeted will be led to a phony webpage that may resemble the Netflix login page. Port software, which is remote access software, will be used to access anything, including your computer. That person will have complete control over your computer and will have the ability to help law enforcement officers across the state.

“People are being told over the telephone to give them the number or they will be arrested,” said John Young, manager of the Clayton County Sheriff’s Office. “It is 100% scams. People should be careful because they are illegal and they are stealing people’s identities.”

Netflix users who are targeted will receive a call from another number that is provided and a “replica” of the Netflix login software that gives the imposter access to the user’s account.

The BBB warns of a similar scam that was run by the Better Business Bureau to avoid getting duped by these scams.

Freshman Robinson delivers for Lady Lions

After winning the District 20-A playoff at 6:30 p.m. Monday at the Kickapoo Area, the Lady Lions (12-4, 3-1) fell behind the Lady Roughnecks. However, the first eight Bearcats that stepped up to the plate went down immediately. A nervous Briana Robinson wound up pitching the first 19 contests with an Achilles injury. “Coming off the injury, we immediately ducked right back into the circle. I wasn’t very nervous,” the freshman said. “She said of Robinson. “She said she was nervous when she went in to begin the fifth inning and the game was tied 3-3. However, the first eight Bearcats that stepped up to the plate went down immediately. Following a wobbly start, Robinson landed the next 12 batters to bunt the Lady Eagles.”

Texas has obtained new execution drug supply

HOUSTON — Texas has obtained a new batch of the drugs it uses to execute death row inmates, allowing the state to continue carrying out death sentences once its existing supply expires at the end of the month.

But correction officials will not say where they bought the drugs, arguing that information must be kept secret to protect the safety of its new suppliers.

In interviews with The Associated Press, officials with the Texas Department of Criminal Justice also refused to say who they paid for the new supplies or whether they were paying the same company or different ones. Officials also declined to provide details about the new drug.

“The state of Texas has obtained the necessary sustenance to continue to execute persons in the death chamber once the current supply of the death chamber drug expires at the end of March,” said Midlothian, Texas, prosecuting attorney Carlton Jones.

Jones said he could not discuss specifics about the new drug because of state laws that prevent the state from disclosing details about the source of its supply.

The debate in the state that executes more inmates than any other comes as major drug manufacturers, many based in Europe, have stopped selling pentobarbital and other substances used in lethal injections to U.S. correction agencies because they oppose the death penalty.

Correction officials were having difficulty finding the drug during the first few months of the year, when the state was put into a new supply contract in March. Another local — although still a legal death penalty state — Texas had blown through pentobarbital to continue carrying out executions through the rest of the year.

Jones said corrections officials are planning to meet Thursday to determine whether to seek a new contract or go to court to force a new supplier to be named.

Jones said the decision to keep details about the new supplier secret puts the agency at odds with past rulings of the inanimate Justice also refused to say where they bought the drugs it uses to execute death row inmates.

But correction officials will not say where they bought the drugs, arguing that information must be kept secret to protect the safety of its new suppliers.

In interviews with The Associated Press, officials with the Texas Department of Criminal Justice also refused to say who they paid for the new supplies or whether they were paying the same company or different ones. Officials also declined to provide details about the new drug.

“The state of Texas has obtained the necessary sustenance to continue to execute persons in the death chamber once the current supply of the death chamber drug expires at the end of March,” said Midlothian, Texas, prosecuting attorney Carlton Jones.

Jones said he could not discuss specifics about the new drug because of state laws that prevent the state from disclosing details about the source of its supply.

The debate in the state that executes more inmates than any other comes as major drug manufacturers, many based in Europe, have stopped selling pentobarbital and other substances used in lethal injections to U.S. correction agencies because they oppose the death penalty.

Correction officials were having difficulty finding the drug during the first few months of the year, when the state was put into a new supply contract in March. Another local — although still a legal death penalty state — Texas had blown through pentobarbital to continue carrying out executions through the rest of the year.

Jones said corrections officials are planning to meet Thursday to determine whether to seek a new contract or go to court to force a new supplier to be named.

Jones said the decision to keep details about the new supplier secret puts the agency at odds with past rulings of the inanimate Justice also refused to say where they bought the drugs it uses to execute death row inmates.

TRAVERSE CITY, Mich. — In Michigan's way-up-north Keweenaw Peninsula, where 200 inches of snow in a single season seems barely a draining, officials know there's nothing in the budget more important than keeping the roads passable.

Yet even they have been caught short, despite a window-dressing campaign for getting, planning and soliciting maintenance funds. "We're trying to do everything we can," said John Verhines, New Mexico's top water official. "We're not in a position to say they're doing it or not doing it."

"We'll have a considerable amount of time," said James S. Broderick, superintendent of the Rio Grande. "It is not a day or two that they are emerging from the depths of the great expanse of the Rio Grande."

Shower faucets caught by surprise, including those for whom dealing with cold and snow is second nature.

"This is a very unique winter, even talking with some of the old timers who have been here longer than I have," said Broderick. "It's more likely the coolness of the winter than the snow that's keeping us busy."

"I think it's more likely the coolness of the winter than the snow that's keeping us busy," Broderick said. "It's really a lot like we've seen in the past."

"We think the Rio Grande is going to be a mixed blessing this year," Broderick said. "It's not going to be a cure-all for the worst of the worst."
